RAIL VERSUS CANAL.

Colonel Andrews Still Says the Ship

Railway at Panama is Not Dead.

In the Fifth Avenue hotel yesterday, says a New York Star reporter, I met Colonel Andrews, the wealthy Pittsburgh man who was the backer of Captain Eads in his Mississippi jetty undertaking and also in the Tehantepec ship railway scheme, which Eads had projected when he died. The Colonel is president of the Tehantepec Ship Railway company at the present time, and is endeavoring to raise money in Europe to build the road on the plans made by Eads. He said to me that while nothing in the way of interoceanic communication is now talked about in this country except the Nicaragua canal, the railway project was very much alive. "It costs a good deal more to build a canal than a ship railway," he continued. "When the canal is built the cost of maintaining it is an enormous sum. Especially at the Isthmus of Panama the maintenance would be very great. What with storms and floods and tidal waves and earthquakes a canal there would be shut up half the time. Where the canal skirts along rock mountains a single little earthquake shock might roll down stone to block up inside of a minute. Then, too, it is exceedingly dangerous to run from vessels through a canal with rock sides and bottom. There is no knowing at what moment the ship may drift upon rock, and something must then give way. Iron ships cannot be steered in a narrow channel. They steer themselves and swing about so slowly and ponderously that in such a rock channel they would be in constant danger."

"I examined the Suez canal very carefully," said Colonel Andrews, "and watched the big ships going through it to see how they move. The Suez canal is a sandy bottom through—white sand, as white as Italian marble. The largest pebbles are no bigger than my thumb nail. The sides are also of sand. Through such a country a canal is entirely feasible, as the Suez canal has been demonstrated to be. But at Panama it is altogether different."
